

the principle of segregation, church and state. Yet religion is dragged into political issues, and political issues are the basis of many sermons.

On beautiful Easter Sunday, these questions crossed my mind: Would I be willing to kneel at the altar rail and share the communion cup with "my black brothers in Christ?" Or would I expect them to be seated in the back pews and come forward only when the last white person had completed communion? This was the custom in "the old days" in our church, and is still practiced in some.

These are soul-searching questions which all white people who have been supporting the integration movement in the name of religion should ask themselves. If they cannot honestly reply with a firm yes to the first question, they are both liars and hypocrites.

Kneel At Altar Rail

Editor of the Daily News: —

I wonder how many others have been as sickened as I have been by the abuse of religion on the part of both groups in the integration controversy.

This country was founded on
